Thinking Critically short answer

How do the images in the poem compare with the images you have formed about antiwar marches in the 1960s?

Given Answer: They both seem rather accurate because on TV you see all these marches with enormous amounts of people and sometimes they get out of hand. When they get out of hand you see the cops with shields and things along that line throwing tear gas into crowds. All the streets are filled with people from one corner to the other corner.

My Feedback

I remember living through those days. I saw the events in real life and on TV. In the meantime it was hard to know what to feel. I had many friends in the army and in Vietnam. While I hate the idea of killing and fighting, I wonder what my responsibility is to those who do not have the freedoms I do nor the power to attain them.

Remember that among is for things you cannot count. You could have a huge amount of sugar in your soda, for example. You need the word numbers in this sentence.
